“Invisible”

Have you ever felt like you are not being noticed? Have you ever imagined being an average girl in school and college? This is not a story but something I want to share.

Life is actually not so perfect and I am not perfect either. Not every story is based on imagination, sometimes it's about real life. So it is my imperfect story. I never felt I am good at anything. And I am not. When I was a kid, I was really bad at studying and the students never talked to me and of course being bullied by them was common. Like I said, I am not good at anything or good at looks. Everyday going to school felt like going to hell. I always had to hear the names like “Rabbit Rabbit” but never talked back to them because I actually looked like a rabbit for my ugly teeth. It was true but it still hurt so much. I never had friends. I was the invisible one. I wished I was good at one thing but no I am not. My childhood is something I don't want back. When I was in KG1 I suffered from jaundice so even though I was sick I studied for my final exam. But of course for me everything had to be the worst. My form teacher didn't agree to make me sit for my final exam because I was a bad student and absent in my class because of my sickness. This never hurts me, what hurts me the most was my mom requesting my form teacher just so I could give the exam. She didn't agree. So I had to repeat KG1 again. After passing my KG1 my mom changed my school. I was admitted in class 3 at my new school. My class 3 was not bad but happiness is not forever. I had to suffer a lot from class 4 to class 8. I did not have any friends so being alone was really something that hurt me. Everyday going to class , coming back home with sadness in my heart. My parents never actually knew the ache. In my class 4 even though I was a bad student I improved a lot with the help of my English teacher. And ‘friends’ ? I wanted friends so bad that I had to give them gifts to be my friend. I know at the end they were just for the gifts. Aah life is so unfair right.

Every class was a pain. Once I gave a girl a hair clip she accepted my gift but gave it to another girl. Even if I was hurt I never showed. It made me realize that “people who don't appreciate it don't deserve it”. I just wanted to be someone who's actually good at something. I wanted to make my mom smile for me. As I was bad at maths I had to go to “Aloha” to improve my maths skills. But there was a girl who was my mom's friend’s daughter, she was so good at doing calculations so my mom bragged about how good she was. I got jealous so I had to cheat in solving my workbook. But I got caught. My mom scolded me. She never asked me why I did it. She just saw from her eyes but not from her heart. I just wanted to make her feel proud of me even in the wrong way because I didn't have the brain. I just realized that “pain will make a person stronger”. Darkness will go away, light is on the way is what I wished from God. Seeing the first girl's name on the board was something I wished for. I wish I was someone whose name was on first, second, third. Wish people actually clapped for me. But wish is something that'll probably never be fulfilled. Among everyone I had one person who loved me for me, my grandma. Losing my grandma in class 8 really changed me. My grandma was really close to me and she was my best friend. Her absence broke something inside me. From class 9 I started improving. Now after all the hardships I am now a university final year student. The road was broken but I fixed my way. Now I have actual friends. Pain does make people stronger but it'll keep the scar. And my scar was childhood. Invisible is not a bad word. Sometimes being invisible can make a person wait for better friends.

Life is not a rainbow it will give cold and warm days. Fun fact, I am still the average one. Trying means unlocking a new door for your future so giving up is not an option.
Everyone is fighting a battle, all we can do is be kind and considerate. “ Being the invisible one is what makes one shine among millions.
